A friend of yours got a new haircut. You think it's terrible, but you say it looks good. You just told a white lie. People tell white lies not for money. They do it because they don't want to hurt people's feelings.

They also do it to protect themselves. White lies may help keep the peace in a short time, but they are not helpful at all in the end. Over time, people around white liars get to know their habit. That makes people not believe what the liars say.

Telling white lies all the time also affects the liars themselves. They choose to hide the truth and say things are good when they are not. That means they are not honest with themselves. After the lies are found out finally, they face another problem—they can't deal with it.

Even if lies may be good sometimes, people may still hurt others' feelings.
